Chapter 1 by SaintSayaka

It's a macabre job, but someone's got to do it. That's the way it often is with things. I doubt anyone grows up with a real interest in janitorial work, or AC installation, or extermination. But they're all jobs that this society needs to keep running - much as the white collar folk like to spit on us.

Still, being the mortician for a cruise ship has its perks. For one, I get to travel a lot.

Chapter 2 by R

You've got to find a really high-line cruise ship to pay for a mortician. Well, that or a tremendously bad one. From my experience, most will just stop at a port for that sort of thing, but that's why my job is interesting.

You see, I don't have to do a lot, and the pay is great. But when there is work, it's always very, very interesting.

The cruise ship Aetelia had almost everything you could imagine. It was huge, like most cruise ships, and amongst the trips it offered were month long tours. There were laundries and fifteen different restaurants, not to mention the ready hospital, and, well, him.

High paying job where you don't have to do much work? Sounds amazing! Well, it is, even with the fact that the stress for the little work done is enormous. Everyone on this ship is rich, and they can have lawyers ready to pounce on any sign of misdoing. Some have lawyers physically with them, on the ship.

Take, for example, the case that lays right here before me. Alexandria Corthall-Meganshire. Very rich. And very, very dead.
